concerned. Moritaro, the Japanese clergyman beside him, began talking almost at once, into the corridor, laughed a contented speaking in Japanese. He said:

"I do not believe that Mr. Glennan was a wise man in his treatment of Japanese workmen, but that does not excuse me for my great sin, and in God's providence I must now die for

"I am very sorry that my bad deed leaves Mr. Glennan's family in such a sorrowful condition. May God bless

"I wish to thank all officers in jail and all my Japanese friends for their great kindness which now helps me to die. Since I have been in prison I have studied the Japanese alphabet and can read my Bible. Before the true loving God I have earnestly repented of all my sin and through Christ I believe God has pardoned me and I can die in peace with the hope of Heaven."

The clergyman translated this for him and while he was rendering the words into the English the murderer looked around upon the crowd and had stood in his cell while the death shouted good bye to some Japanese warrant was being read. The crowd newspaper men in the crowd, bobbing his head as he gave the salutation after the Japanese manner and smiling in an engaging way.

Then, when the interpretation had been finished Warden Kamana drew the black cap quickly over Moritaro's head, and the noose was adjusted about his neck. The Rev. Mr. Motokawa knelt in prayer, sinking down upon his hands and knees. It had been arranged that when the clergyman pronounced the word "Amen," the trap would be sprung. The prayer, not a long one, was finished

And the murderer of Albion J. Glennan was hurled into eternity. His neck was broken by the drop, so nicely had the weights been balanced and the man died instantly, although the medical jury, Drs. Moore, Sinclair and Oyama, did not pronounce him dead until fifteen minutes had elapsed. There was a slight convulsive movement after the drop was sprung, but that was all. The body, after it was cut down, was handed to the Japanese friends of the dead man,

The arrangements for the execution were as said before, supervised by High Sheriff Henry, although the actual details were looked after by Warden Kamana and Deputy Burke. rested in Alea.
